Preventive archaeology and its impact on the study of past societies. Possibilities and reality

The main aim of the session is to touch upon all the current problems of preventive archeology, especially in the broad context of research into past societies. One of the goals of the session is also to define preventive archeology and its doctrine in various countries. To what extent is the practice of preventive archeology still imbued with the spirit of "Malta convention"? During the session, we want to discuss the relationship between preventive archeology and the sphere of politics, legal, organizational, financial and institutional issues. As the theme of the 19th UISPP Congress in Meknes is focused on the past societies, we want to address the interdependence of the social, economic and environmental spheres of human existence. The session is also aimed at presenting the scientific results of rescue excavations centered around paleosociological issues. The organizers expect that the session will promote good practices of preventive archaeology and will contribute to networking and fruitful exchange of experience among its participants.
